Construir la memoria de la ciudad Gregoria Cavero Domínguez, 2015 Presentamos aquí el primer volumen de los resultados del proyecto de investigación del Gobierno de España, Ministerio de Economía y Competitividad (ref. HAR2013-46388-R) bajo el título Construir la memoria de la ciudad: espacios, poderes e identidades en la Edad Media (XII-XV). Estructurado en tres años, el citado proyecto conllevaba la celebración de tres reuniones científicas, una cada año, a celebrar en tres sedes distintas de los ámbitos territoriales del propio grupo de investigación constituido al efecto: España, Italia (Siena) y Portugal (Braga). Los resultados de la primera reunión científica, celebrada en León, se presentan aquí bajo el título La ciudad publicitada: de la documentación a la Arqueología.

Quaderns, 1992

The New City Jean-François Lejeune, 1992 The most modern of the 'modern' in architecture today are probably our large cities. Their unprecedented size has given rise to a number of new problems that await an architectural solution. With the growth of all large cities, the question of city planning in particular has come to the fore, as in many cases there appears an urgent need to strive for a rational solution to this matter. Every city plan naturally has two parts: the expanding peripheral part, where technology and art can act rather freely, and the compact town center, where the desire for new form must accommodate itself to the sea of houses, monuments of art, existing facilities, and parks. Both parts are naturally dependent on each other, and many a problem can be solved by considering the municipal area as a whole. Unfortunately greater emphasis is always placed on the seemingly more urgent problems of the town center, and the periphery is treated as a matter of second importance. This is quite wrong because new calamities inevitably arise before long, and questions repeatedly crop up that just as urgently demand solutions -- Amazon.
