

Social Cognitive Career Theory

Taneisha S. Buchanan

An Investigation of the Prestige Interest Dimension Using Social Cognitive Career Theory for African American Women Taneisha S. Buchanan, 2010 Social Cognitive Career Theory (SCCT; Lent, Brown, & Hackett, 1994) is a well-researched social cognitive theory of vocational development that takes into account the influence of personal, social, and environmental variables. Previous SCCT research encompasses a variety of domains including Holland's (1997) RIASEC types and math and science, and includes samples across race/ethnicity. However, few studies have examined the theory for African American women or reported findings separately for this group, and no studies have included prestige as an interest dimension. An important limitation of the vocational psychology literature is that although prestige has been conceptualized as an important construct (e.g., Gottfredson 1981, 1996) there have been few theoretically-driven studies on prestige. A promising representation of vocational interests was proposed by Tracey and Rounds (1996a); this interest model locates prestige as orthogonal to the dimensions underlying the RIASEC types. In order to address the aforementioned limitations of the SCCT research, this dissertation examined SCCT on the prestige dimension as conceptualized by Tracey and Rounds with a sample of 198 African American university and college women. A series of path analyses was conducted to test the hypothesized relations among the following variables: mother's occupational prestige, mother's educational prestige, prestige self-efficacy, prestige outcome expectations, prestige of vocational interests, and career choice prestige. Career choice prestige was assessed in two ways, using (1) an occupational consideration measure, and (2) prestige ratings of participants' reported occupational goal. The proposed models provided good fit to the data, and several of the SCCT hypotheses were supported. Across models, the hypothesized paths from mother's occupational prestige and mother's education level to prestige self-efficacy and prestige outcome expectations, and the hypothesized direct paths from prestige self-efficacy to prestige outcome expectations and prestige of choice goals were not supported. Interestingly, prestige outcome expectations emerged as a stronger predictor of prestige of choice goals than prestige self-efficacy and prestige of vocational interests. Overall, the findings provide support for integrating prestige as a domain of interests within SCCT. Future research is needed to further investigate the relative influence of self-efficacy, outcome expectations, and interests on career choice goals on the prestige dimension and across race/ethnicity and gender.

Women Pursuing Nontraditional Careers Julia A. Ericksen, OhioLINK Electronic Theses and Dissertations Center, 2013

Abstract: Women pursuing nontraditional careers face many obstacles and constraints that can limit or impede their career development. Those who wish to participate in trades and construction occupations must often overcome the absence of meaningful learning experiences and role models, weak self-efficacy beliefs, uncertain outcome expectations along with cultural and institutional barriers. Social Cognitive Career Theory (SCCT; Lent, Brown, & Hackett, 1994) provides a theoretical framework to study the career development of these women. The learning experiences, self-efficacy beliefs, and outcome expectations of 73 women with expressed Realistic interests were examined to further illuminate their career interest development. Results of this study demonstrated that some of the propositions suggested by SCCT (1994), particularly the positive and significant relations between learning experiences and interests, self-efficacy and interests, and outcome expectations and interests, were supported for this sample of women. Recommendations for career counseling practice and research are offered.

An Examination of the Applicability of Social Cognitive Career Theory for African American College Students Josephine Dickinson, 2007

Lent, Brown, and Hackett's (1994) social cognitive career theory (SCCT) is a theoretical model of career development that delineates how person, contextual, and sociocognitive factors affect the formation of vocational interests, career choice goals, career choice actions, and academic/career performance attainments. Although considerable research support has been demonstrated for several key paths in SCCT, several other areas of SCCT have been under-researched or have received mixed empirical support. The purpose of the present study was to address several limitations of the extant literature. Specifically, the present study examined (a) the applicability of SCCT with an African American sample, (b) the validity of SCCT across Holland's (1997) six vocational domains, (c) the role of specific learning experiences in the formation of corresponding self-efficacy and outcome expectations, and (d) the moderating role of perceptions of racism in the relationship between vocational interests and corresponding choice goals. Results of path analyses based on a sample of 208 African American college students revealed strong support for all of the hypothesized relations involving corresponding learning experiences, self-efficacy beliefs, outcome expectations, vocational interests and choice goals for each of the six Holland themes. Furthermore, although the nature of some of the observed relations (i.e., direct vs. indirect) was not always supportive of my hypotheses, overall, the results indicated that SCCT is a valid model to use with African Americans. In addition, the results revealed strong support for the applicability of SCCT to Holland's (1997) RIASEC themes. Regarding the role of specific learning experiences in self-efficacy and outcome expectations, results revealed partial support for both my hypothesis that verbal persuasion would contribute most strongly and SCCT's predication that performance accomplishments would account for the majority of the unique variance. These findings suggest that for African American college students, the role that learning experiences play in the formation of their self-efficacy beliefs and outcome expectations is domain-specific.

Finally, results of moderated regressions and follow-up analyses tended not to support the hypothesis that perceptions of racism would moderate the relationship between vocational interests and choice goals. The results revealed that perceptions of racism significantly moderated the interest-goals relation in only one model--the Realistic model for men--and, contrary to prediction, a greater perception of racism actually strengthened the Realistic interest-choice goals relationship.--Abstract.

Using Social Cognitive Career Theory to Conceptualize and Develop a Measure of the Barriers to Career Choice for Individuals who Have Criminal Records Devon Leeann Cummings, 2008 The goal of this study was to create a questionnaire designed to measure the barriers to career choice that exist for individuals who have criminal records (i.e., ex-offenders). This measure was based on the social cognitive career theory (SCCT; Lent, Brown, & Hackett, 1994) choice model, which postulates that barriers related to three components of the model (i.e., person inputs, background contextual affordances, and proximal contextual influences) may limit career choice. Items for this measure were developed based on a review of literature related to barriers to career choice that exist for ex-offenders, ethnic minority group members, women, low socioeconomic status group members, individuals who abuse substances, and individuals who have mental illness. After preliminary efforts were taken to refine the measure (i.e., having it reviewed by experts on the population of ex-offenders, researchers who have developed barriers measures, an SCCT expert, and a small group of ex-offenders, as well as a pilot test with 50 ex-offenders), it was given to individuals who have at least one criminal conviction and have searched for a job while having that conviction on their records. An Exploratory Factor Analysis was used to determine whether the underlying factor structure of the measure's items was consistent with the principles of social cognitive career theory. Contrary to this hypothesis, the measure demonstrated eight factors that consisted of more complex factor structures than the general constructs of person and environment, or even the separation of distal and proximal environmental influences.--Abstract.

The Role of Social Cognitive Career Theory and Personality Variables in Predicting Career Congruence, Satisfaction, and Decidedness Lauren J. Roscoe, 2001

Social Cognitive Career Theory & the Career Development of Southeast Asian American College Students Vinh Tan Nguyen, 2021 Southeast Asian American (SEAA) (Cambodia American, Hmong American, Laotian American, Vietnamese American) college students have historically been neglected by higher education researchers, policymakers, and practitioners. This has contributed to their marginalization/misrepresentation in higher education as well as to them being underserved and underrepresented by higher education institutions. This study uses social cognitive career theory (SCCT) as the theoretical framework for examining the impact of the model minority myth and of social cognitive factors (e.g., parents, family, peers, institutional agents) on the career development phenomenon of SEAA. This study is significant because it adds to the dearth of literature on Asian American career development in general and SEAA in particular. It is also significant because it is one of the few studies that employs a qualitative approach to studying the career development of SEAA through the SCCT framework

The Application of Social Cognitive Career Theory to Preservice Teachers Cara Mia Crumpton Braswell, 2000

Should I Stay Or Should I Go? Megan L. Drangstveit, 2020 Understanding the decision-making process people use when considering career options and how those decisions manifest can inform practice for individuals, organizations, and professions. This study explored individual paths and decision-making among student affairs professionals in an attempt to identify themes in career decision-making. This study is an exploration of how individuals make the smaller decisions about their current and future roles, not a study of attrition versus persistence. A better understanding of decision-making among student affairs professionals can inform practice for individuals, organizations, and the profession. The question driving the study was, how do student affairs professionals make career decisions? Social Cognitive Career Theory (SCCT) (Lent, 2012) provided the theoretical framework for this qualitative study. Fifteen student affairs professionals agreed to participate in recorded, semi-structured interviews. Data were analyzed and interpreted through a SCCT lens focusing on three variables related to career development: self-efficacy beliefs, outcome expectations, and personal goals. Themes that emerged include individual considerations, professional experiences, timing of discovering student affairs, value placed on graduate degrees, frustrations related to compensation and opportunities, politics, shifting priorities, and thoughts of leaving the profession. Student affairs should be more intentional about recruitment and preparation of professionals in the field and career progression, as relying on happenstance as a method of entry into the field is not sound.
