Métodos para determinar el rendimiento del motor de inducción trifásico en operación Juan Antonio Sanz Ruiz, 2011 El presente proyecto trata de analizar algunos de los métodos más utilizados en la actualidad para determinar el rendimiento en operación de los motores de inducción existentes en la literatura técnica, así como proponer posibles métodos alternativos. El IEC (International Electrotechnical Commission) edita las normas correspondientes para la determinación del rendimiento, normas que exigen la realización de pruebas y ensayos que, cuando el motor esta instalado en el lugar de trabajo, pueden ser difíciles de implementar. Cuando exista la dificultad de implementarse el procedimiento indicado en las normas IEC, puede recurrirse a métodos aproximados llamados en operación, métodos que implican una menor intrusión en el motor y por tanto la posibilidad de implementarse con el motor instalado en el puesto de trabajo, aunque debe tenerse en cuenta que el error en la determinación del rendimiento aumentara. Se estudiaran diferentes métodos existentes en la actualidad y se analizara su utilidad atendiendo a criterios de invasión en su puesta en práctica y a criterios de exactitud, en comparación con los métodos que propone la norma. Para realizar este estudio se han analizado 5 motores de inducción diferentes de potencias comprendidas entre los 0,75kW y los 56kW. Finalmente se han comparado los resultados obtenidos por los distintos métodos estudiados, con los principales métodos que ofrece la norma IEC 60034-2-1, y se ha realizado un estudio económico de los equipos de medidas necesarios para cada caso.
