Angular Limb Deformities Affecting the Canine Radius and Ulna Jessica L. Knapp, 2015 We hypothesized that 1) antebrachial ALDs would be more complex with respect to multiplicity in chondrodystrophic dogs, and 2) more complex ALDs would exhibit a higher incidence of concurrent joint radiographic disease. Medical records from 2006 to 2013 were searched and cases included of dogs diagnosed with thoracic limb lameness attributable to antebrachial ALDs with orthogonal radiographs or CT scans of the affected antebrachium. Classification of the deformity in the frontal plane, and the presence of sagittal plane angulation, torsion, and adjacent joint radiographic disease were determined and compared. Thirty-five uniapical, 70 biapical, and 1 multiapical deformities in the frontal plane were identified. The incidence of biapical deformities was statistically higher in chondrodystrophic versus non-chondrodystrophic dogs ($P = 0.02$). When breeds were combined, biapical deformities were associated with a significantly higher incidence of adjacent joint radiographic disease ($P = 0.049$); more frequently resulting in elbow disease ($P = 0.022$). Overall, 82% of the 106 limbs had radiographic evidence of either elbow or carpal joint disease at the time of presentation. In dogs with limb deformities, particularly chondrodystrophic dogs, biapical deformities are common. Adjacent joint radiographic disease should be evaluated in all patients presenting for antebrachial deformities

Correction of Angular Limb Deformity in a 4 Month Old German Shepherd Christopher James Hilton, 2008 This is the case report of a 4 month old female German shepherd that was diagnosed with an angular limb deformity. General physical examination was unremarkable on presentation, while orthopedic examination of the right forelimb revealed radius curvus, carpal valgus, and decreased elbow flexion with pain. A presumptive diagnosis of premature closure of the distal ulnar physis was made. CT examination was performed in preparation of surgical correction revealing subluxation of the radial head, incongruity of the radial head and ulna at the elbow joint, and abnormal distal radial and ulnar physes.
