Quality of Life in Patients Treated for Anal Fistula Harriet Alice Owen,2012 Results: Patients with anal fistula had an overall reduced quality of life (QOL) when compared to population norms, patients with recurrent disease fared worse. Patients with a loose seton had the same reduced QOL as those with no seton. Quality of life was significantly improved following fistulotomy and returned to that of the general population. Where fistulotomy result in a deterioration in continence, the improvement in QOL was still maintained in the domains of Bodily Pain and Mental Health. Patients with a fistula and urgency had a reduced QOL compared to those with a fistula and no urgency across 5 of the 8 SF-36 domains. No difference in urgency was found between patients with and without a seton. In primary fistulas 1 in 5 patients experienced urgency, the figure for recurrent fistulas was 1 in 3. A cranial shift in squeeze HPZ was seen in all patients with an intersphincteric fistulotomy except where there was a deterioration in continence. No patient with a trans-sphincteric fistulotomy had a cranial shift in the squeeze HPZ. VVP for the majority of patient remained the same. There was a correlation between change in caudal Squeeze-VVP (S-VVP) and length of division; there was also a correlation between change in S-VVP and change in continence score; plus change in total squeeze pressure asymmetry and change in continence score. Where post operative S-VVP reduced, this was matched by a post operative fall in Physical Functioning on the SF-36 assessment. Conclusions: Following fistulotomy, it was voluntary contraction (squeeze pressure) that was of greatest importance in maintaining sphincter pressure and continence. Urgency is affected by voluntary muscle function; the investigations showed that it was voluntary contraction of the anal sphincter that affected quality of life.
