Refugees and Asylum Rebecca M. M. Wallace,1996 Europe has, during the last five years, witnessed the displacement of large groups of persons, political uncertainty, economic recession and an abrupt revival of xenophobia and nationalism. Against this backcloth western European countries have sought to review their practices and procedures with respect to the granting of asylum and refugee status - a review which without exception has led to the introduction of more restrictive measures...It is imperative that changes to existing procedures and practices and the introduction of new measures should be comprehensively articulated and should also conform to acknowledged human rights standards. Universally acceptable minimum standards must be established for handling the applications of those seeking refugee status and these standards should recognise, safeguard and guarantee the human rights of the individual concerned. This text identifies the standards it is believed should be employed to gauge asylum procedures and practices. -- from the Preface.
