The Measurement of the Specific Heat of Aluminum Bob Heingartner, 1981 The specific heat of solids has long been a subject of theoretical interest. According to the equipartition theorem of classical thermodynamics, $C_v = 3R$, R being the ideal gas constant, for all solids regardless of temperature. In 1907 Einstein proposed a new theory which assumed that atoms in a solid crystal all vibrate together with a single discrete frequency. His model predicted a decrease in C_v with decreasing temperature in rough agreement with already established experiments.
