Study of Multiprogrammed Computer Systems with Memory Hierarchies Rodrigo Querubin,C. V. Ramamoorthy,1972 The possibility of using queueing networks to study the performance of multiprogrammed computer systems that use memory hierarchies was investigated. It was found that these kinds of models are adequate provided the success function of the memory hierarchy is known. A stochastic algorithm to obtain the success function of the hierarchy was developed. The results obtained, whenever this model is used in conjunction with the queueing network, were extensively compared with conventional simulation techniques, and the accuracy found to be within five percent. The problem of scheduling the Central Processor was considered, and empirical algorithms to determine policies that set upper and lower bounds on the success function of the hierarchy were proposed. Mathematical methods were employed to analyze various system configurations, that include several input-output channels and processors. (Author).

Marine Biological Sound, West of San Clemente Island P. O. Thompson,1965 A survey was made of the biological sound present in a set of tape recordings obtained from a hydrophone at 60 fathoms and another at 450 fathoms, over an 8-day period. A variety of types of biological sound were distinguished and analyzed. They were shown to have significant influence on the ambient noise level. (Author).

Fouling on a Deep-anchored Submarine Hull I. E. Davies,1965 The factors in the marine biological environment that pertain to underwater sound were investigated and are reported. Organisms affecting sound attenuation and reflection are identified and studied. The distribution of such organisms in space and time to gain a predictive understanding of their fluctuations in critical areas of the ocean is discussed. Specifically, the U.S. Navy submarine SQUAW (No. 29) was examined and a report was made on the biological fouling present after approximately 5 years of submergence at a depth of 200 feet in the deep oceanic environment. The fouling organisms are identified and their numbers are estimated. Their distribution on the hull is described. (Author).

Geoacoustic Models of the Sea Floor E. L. Hamilton,1965 The information and technology necessary to derive a valid geological-geophysical-acoustic model of the sea floor are presented. Two contrasting models are detailed and discussed: one in the Bering Sea which has a shallow-water, high-velocity, hard-sand bottom; and the Mohole (Guadalupe Site) model which has a deep-water, low-velocity, soft-clay bottom. Other models are to be reported in a continuing series. (Author).

Aspects of a Dynamically Adaptive Operating System Parker Ray Blevins, 1972 Real-time optimization of the overall performance of a computer system inherently requires the introduction of adaptive control into selected control functions or sets of control functions. Global management of the resulting multiloop control system becomes the responsibility of the operating system. Investigated aspects of this evolutionary extension of the operating system called the Dynamically Adaptive Operating System include the general methodology, the real-time modeling and estimation of resource demands, and implementation considerations of an adaptive CPU scheduling function. The proposed methodology consists of three processes, Identification, Decision, and Modification, and a control and information flow hierarchy. System status descriptors are classified and developed. Investigated aspects of the real-time modeling and estimation of resource demand patterns include: a general principle of locality, statistical models providing either one or two degrees of estimator freedom including a Dynamically Partitioned Second Moment Model, and techniques for approximating the remaining time estimators. (Author Modified Abstract).

Internal Waves in the Sea Owen S. Lee, 1965 Internal waves exist in the ocean as a rule rather than an exception. Energy is transported by them in channels that are similar to sound channels. Their effect on naval exercises and equipment, particularly functions involving the use of underwater sound, can be expected to be more pronounced in these channels. Although theory and observation are still not adequate for a full understanding of the phenomenon, western literature prior to June 1963 contains more than 300 publications dealing with internal waves in the atmosphere, lakes, and seas. These publications are listed in the comprehensive bibliography which is part of this report. (Author).
