Eccentric Growth and the Formation of Redwood in the Main Stem of Conifers (Classic Reprint) George P. Burns, 2017-11-09 Excerpt from Eccentric Growth and the Formation of Redwood in the Main Stem of Conifers A number of trees Of pitch pine, Pinus rigida, growing in the open were so trimmed that the branches were left only on about 120 degrees of the circumference. After two to four years these were cut and examined. They showed no correlation between the width of the rings and the method of trimming. Whatever the factor causing eccentric growth it evidently is not the method of trimming and is not dependent upon the place of food supply from the leaves. That the cambium may be caused to divide more rapidly by other stimuli than that of gravity is evident from a study of the literature reviewed by Grossenbacher. One striking example was found in a very old sycamore tree, Platanus occidentalis. This large tree grew near the shipyards of the Champlain Transportation Company at Shelburne, Vt. These yards have been used continuously for ship building and repairs for fully a hundred years. The trunk of the tree exhibited numerous wart-like projections of various sizes on its surface. One was at a loss to explain the matter until a large spike was found extending from the center of one of these warts. By use of an axe it was soon determined that a spike was buried in each projection. In this case there was evidently a traumatropic response. Summary 1. Redwood and eccentric growth usually but not necessarily Occur together. About the Publisher Forgotten Books publishes hundreds of thousands of rare and classic books.
