Knowledge And Beliefs Of Functional Medicine And Integrative And Functional Nutrition Of Adults With And Without Diabetes Michelle Ashley Yako,2020 As the incidence rates of diabetes progress, a change in the treatment approach may be necessary. Functional medicine (FM) and integrative and functional nutrition (IFN) are processes that recognize the genetic and environmental differences in each individual, addressing the root cause of a disease. Several studies have explored the effects of functional interventions on diabetic patients, but there is little evidence to show how often these practices are used and accepted by healthcare professionals and individuals with diabetes. The purpose of this study is to investigate the current knowledge and beliefs, along with utilization of the various practices of FM and IFN among faculty and staff with or without diabetes mellitus at Kent State University. Participants were faculty and staff residing at KSU who completed a survey containing of five parts: (1) a researcher developed knowledge of FM/IFN questionnaire, (2) the complementary and alternative medicine health belief questionnaire (CHBQ), (3) a researcher developed utilization of FM/IFN, and (4) a set of demographic questions. The current study found no significance between the knowledge of FM/IFN and the CHBQ scores between those with and without diabetes. Also, the majority of participants who completed this survey had never heard of FM/IFN before and are generally unsure if it can help to treat chronic disease but were interested in learning more. In addition, the most common supplements taken by the participants were multivitamins, vitamin D, calcium, and magnesium. In the majority of the participants, no herbal supplements were used regularly. The findings of this study support the need for more public education in regard to FM/IFN. With the increased interest for FM/IFN in today's society, healthcare professionals must first be educated on these practices so that they are more comfortable and confident in discussing them with their patients.
