Improving Therapeutic Communication Skills to Improve Patient Outcomes Susan E. Poteet Benfield, 2010 Communication skills are an important part of giving competent nursing care. The nursing student struggles with this skill from the beginning in fundamentals of nursing. Taylor, Lillis, Lemone & Lynn (2008) describe communication as essential to each professional nursing role and as the heart of caring. Often students are very concerned about entering the behavioral medicine unit for fear they will not know how to begin an interaction with a client. The interpersonal process recording (written verbatim account of conversation with a patient) often reveals that the student has difficulty responding using correct communication skills. The purpose of this project is to improve the verbal and non-verbal therapeutic communication skills of nurses through improved pedagogy in an associate degree-nursing program. The patient outcome of nurses' improved therapeutic communication is improved communication and relationship building with caregivers. -- Introduction
