Integration of the Tripartite Model and the Cognitive Content-specificity Model for Depression and Anxiety

Bradley D. Benedict, 2001

An Investigation of the Tripartite Model in Three Age Cohorts of Children and Youth Cynthia Michelle Turner, 2003 A large body of literature exists to show that childhood anxiety and depression are significantly interrelated, both at the disorder and the symptom level. Clark and Watson (1991) proposed that a tripartite model could account for the observed relations between anxiety and depression. The tripartite model holds that while anxiety and depression share a substantial component of general affective distress or negative affectivity (NA), they can be meaningfully differentiated on the basis of specific symptoms. Anhedonia, or low positive affect (PA), is seen as specific to depression, and physiological arousal (PH), or somatic tension, is seen as unique to anxiety. The studies presented in this thesis were designed to investigate the tripartite model of anxiety and depression in children and youth.

Frontiers of Cognitive Therapy Paul M. Salkovskis, 1997-03-15 Bringing together cognitive therapy clinicians, researchers, and theoreticians, this volume integrates the latest findings on the conceptualization and treatment of a range of psychological and psychiatric problems. From depression and anxiety, to eating disorders, hypochondriasis, obsessive-compulsive disorder, panic, personality disorders, sexual problems, social phobia, and substance abuse, authors discuss the needs of individual patients and structuring effective interventions. Factors such as therapist competence, the therapeutic relationship and empathy are systematically examined. Chapters also consider the specific needs of populations such as children and adolescents and the mentally ill.

Handbook of Medical Psychiatry Jair C. Soares, Samuel Gershon, 2003-03-19 This volume examines attempts to identify genetic risk factors and environmental components contributing to the development of psychiatric disorders. It explores the symptoms, courses, outcomes, treatment responses and aetiologies of a range of psychiatric illnesses to improve disease classification schemes.
