A Survey of how Patients Value Basic Principles of Medical Ethics Walter Le, 2013 Today in most medical schools, there exist four basic principles of medical ethics that are taught. These principles should help guide doctors and their patients in medical decision making. The principles include autonomy, justice, beneficence, and non-maleficence. These four principles provide a basic framework to deal with ethical problems that arise in the healthcare field. Prior to the 20th century, it was widely accepted by physicians and patients that the principle of beneficence was far superior to patient autonomy. In fact, patients did not play a huge role in medical decision making at all. It was assumed that doctors knew what was best for patients. This was commonly referred to as the beneficence model. However at the turn of the 20th century, there has been a shift towards a model where autonomy is more valued than beneficence. Patients are now included in the decision making process. Overall, this model is commonly referred to as the autonomy model. These days, it is assumed that the patient knows what is best for the patient. The goal of this survey is to see if patients actually do value autonomy over beneficence. The other two principles of medical ethics, justice and non-maleficence, will be included as well. In summary, the survey will seek to see how patients value each of the four principles of medical ethics in comparison to one another. This will shed light on which principles are coming into play when patients make a medical decision. Hopefully as physicians, we can use this information to better understand patients and provide healthcare.
