Secondary Battery Session Improved Aircraft Battery Sylvia A. Duze, James M. Hill, ARMY ELECTRONICS

TECHNOLOGY AND DEVICES LAB FORT MONMOUTH N J., 1974 At the 23rd Annual Power Sources Conference a proposed redesign of a standard 19-cell 22.8 volt nickel-cadmium aircraft battery (BB-433/A) rated at 30 Ah at the one hour rate was discussed. Battery BB-433/A has been widely assigned in Army aircraft and has been the subject of many failure reports from the field. Since that time, efforts have been spent on the development of the redesigned battery. Simulated aircraft service cycling tests and other electrical and environmental tests were performed on standard and redesigned batteries to determine the feasibility of the redesign concept.

Evaluation and Improvement of a Sealed Battery System for Aircraft Ted Allan McWhorter,1976 A sealed nickel cadmium battery with an integral power conditioning package called a Maintenance Free Aircraft Battery was evaluated for compatibility and performance in B-52H, C-135, KC-135 and UH-1F aircraft. Modifications were made to the battery system, as necessary to achieve satisfactory performance. Flight test results are presented. General compatibility and good performance of the first version of the maintenance free battery system was experimentally demonstrated. It is recommended that further work be undertaken to establish a reliable, long term system.

Electronic Warfare: Towed Decoys Could Improve Survivability of Current Navy Aircraft ,1997 Traditionally, DOD'S combat aircraft have used on-board electronic warfare devices called jammers for self-protection against radar-controlled weapons, including missiles and anti-aircraft artillery. These jammers emit electronic signals from the aircraft to try to impede or deny the threat radar's ability to locate the aircraft. DOD'S existing self-protection jamming systems for its tactical aircraft have limitations against certain threats, and these threats are expected to be improved. DOD has modified existing systems, such as the Air Force's ALQ-131 used on the F-16 and the ALQ-135 on the F-15, and has developed a newer system, the Navy's Airborne Self-Protection Jammer (ASPJ), which is being used on some F-14D and F/A-18C/D aircraft. As we have previously reported, however, testing after deployment has shown that the modified jammer systems have had problems, while operational testing of ASPJ and otherjammers showed they were unable to meet effectiveness criteria against certain classified threats.
