Evaluating the Contribution of Competency-Based Training Dianne Mulcahy,Pauline James,1999 The contribution of competency-based training (CBT) to Australia's vocational education and training (VET) sector was examined through three data collection activities: review of Australian and international literature on VET and CBT; telephone survey of a sample of training managers of 195 companies across Australia; and 8 intensive case studies of competency-based VET programs throughout Australia. According to the literature review, the contribution of CBT to outcomes in VET is strongly related to the following: how competency is conceived; flexibility in the development and use of national competency standards; and processes and structures of training provision. The national telephone survey indicated that CBT's success relies on the following three factors: (1) specific skills, on-the-job learning and assessment, and recognized training with formal acknowledgment of skills in a qualifications structure; (2) enterprise development in adapting to and managing changing workplace realities; and (3) workplace and industry accountability. The case studies showed that CBT's outcomes depend on how competency is conceived and how the training process is defined. (The report contains 115 references. Appendixes, constituting approximately 40% of this document, contain the following: national survey information, descriptions of case study sites, case studies, telephone survey questionnaire, case study observation schedule, and case study interview questionnaire.) Competency-Based Training Needs Assessment SMI Australia,2012-03

Competency-based Training Josie Misko,1999 This book provides a review of (primarily Australian) research on competency-based training (CBT). It includes information on the industrial and economic contexts that formed the backdrop for training reform in Australia. Information is presented to show how implementation of CBT has affected teaching, learning, and administration in vocational education and training (VET). Evidence about the effectiveness of CBT is taken from empirical studies conducted in Australia and overseas and theoretical debates on the relative merits of CBT. Studies are included that have examined the implementation of CBT from the perspective of VET teachers, administrators, and students. Findings are mixed. They show the positive and negative effects of CBT reforms on the work of teachers and administrators and the learning of students. Positive effects are an increased focus on delivering training that is responsive to the needs of the workplace, increased accessibility and flexibility of training for clients, and training based on national industry or enterprise-specific standards. The negative effects are related to the inadequate resourcing and preparation of VET teachers and trainers for the implementation of the reforms, increased administrative obligations, and dissatisfaction with outcomes of the learning approach that is promoted under a modularized curriculum. The review concludes with implications for further research, including comparisons of outcomes obtained by students prior to and after CBT implementation. (Contains 60 references.) (YLB)

Competency-based Training in Australia ,2000

Evaluating the Contribution of Competency-Based Training Dianne Mulcahy,Pauline James,2002 The article reports the findings of a national evaluation study conducted in 1998 of the contribution of competency-based training (CBT) to outcomes in vocational education and training in Australia. The study found that CBT has made significant contributions to employers, its main benefit being that learning can be achieved on-the-job. Thus the key advantage for enterprises is relevant training where relevance means 'specific skills for specific jobs'. The conclusion is drawn that three key issues in relation to the practice of competency training in Australia need to be addressed: (i) recognition of the role of the expert practitioner in augmenting, and thus improving, CBT; (ii) recognition of the limitations of CBT with regard to the provision of knowledgeable skill; and (iii) recognition of the importance of defining learning in terms of outcomes and process.

Training and Development in Australia Andrew Smith,1998 Written in a practical and readable fashion, this book contains comprehensive coverage of the theory and practice essential for a clear understanding of the role of training and development in modern organisations. Key issues highlighting the importance of effective training are discussed, including reforms to the education and training system, apprenticeships, labour market programs, multiskilling, broad-banking and the impact of award restructuring. The second edition has been updated and includes several new chapters reflecting the changes in training practice in the last few years. Changes to the VET system are analysed, as well as the changing role of training and development in organisations and the emergence of the learning organisation.

Adding Value to Competency-based Training ,2022 Competency-based training (CBT) has been fundamental to how accredited vocational education and training (VET) is delivered in Australia for the last three decades or so and over this time it has garnered both advocates and critics. This research examines the strengths and weaknesses of CBT as it is currently applied to the Australian VET system and whether there is cause to consider a broader approach to defining and describing competence and hence considering how best teaching and learning in VET is delivered and assessed.
